Day 7

Receiving Your Strength

Welcome to Day 7 of your Covenant Protocol. Find your quiet place, put your earphones in, and close your eyes. Take a breath in and release slowly. Seven days. You've completed the first week. Every single day you showed up. Do you understand what that means? It means you're someone who keeps her word. Even to herself. Let's begin.

Heavenly Father, today I want to do something different. Every other day this week I've been praying outward. For my marriage. For my husband. For my home. For the walls to come down and the silence to break and the outcome to be surrendered. And all of that has been right and good and necessary.

But today, today I'm praying for me. Not for what I can do for my marriage. Not for what I can become for my husband. Just for me. Because I've realized this week that I've been so focused on everyone else's healing that I've forgotten to receive my own. And I can't pour from an empty vessel, Lord. I need to be filled.

So today I'm asking You to fill me. Strengthen me. Restore in me what this season has taken. Because this season has taken things, Father. It's taken my sense of security. It's taken my confidence. It's taken the easy joy that used to come naturally before all of this started. It's taken sleep and peace and the ability to be fully present in moments that deserve my full presence.

I'm not saying that to complain. I'm saying it because I want to be honest with You about where I actually am. Not where I wish I was. Not where I'm pretending to be for everyone around me. But where I actually am right now. And right now, Lord, I'm tired. I'm really tired. And I need You to meet me here.

Your Word says that those who hope in You will renew their strength. That they'll soar on wings like eagles. That they'll run and not grow weary. That they'll walk and not faint. I'm holding onto that promise today, Lord. Because some days soaring feels impossible. Some days I'm not even running. Some days I'm just walking. And some days I'm barely doing that.

But even in the barely walking days, You promised not to let me faint. And I'm trusting that promise right now. I'm trusting that underneath me are Your everlasting arms. That even when I feel like I'm falling, I'm actually being carried. That even in my weakest moments, Your strength is being made perfect in my weakness.

Father, restore my sense of identity today. Because one of the quietest casualties of a marriage in crisis is the slow erosion of knowing who you are. When the person who was supposed to choose you every day stops choosing you, something in your sense of self starts to quietly crack. And I've felt that crack, Lord. I've felt myself shrinking.

Remind me today of who I am. Not who I am as a wife. Not who I am as a mother or a daughter or an employee or any of the other roles I carry. But who I am at the core. The woman You knit together in my mother's womb. The person You knew before I was born. The one You called by name before I had a name.

That woman is still here. She didn't disappear when this crisis began. She's just been buried under the weight of it. And today I'm asking You to call her back to the surface. Call her forward. Remind her of her strength. Remind her of her worth. Remind her that her value was never dependent on whether her husband sees it or not.

I ask You to restore my joy today. Not a performance of joy. Not a pretending everything is fine joy. But the deep quiet joy that comes from knowing that You are God and that You are good and that nothing happening in my life right now has changed either of those facts. The joy that isn't shaken by circumstances because it isn't built on circumstances.

Restore my peace, Lord. The kind that guards my heart and my mind. The kind that shows up in the middle of the night when the thoughts start spinning and quiets them before they can take me somewhere dark. The kind that says it's okay to rest. It's okay to not have all the answers tonight. It's okay to trust that tomorrow has enough grace for tomorrow's problems.

I ask You to give me a fresh vision for my life today. Not just for my marriage. For my life. Because I've realized that somewhere in the middle of this crisis I stopped dreaming. I stopped imagining a future that had joy and purpose and meaning in it. Everything became about surviving this. And Lord, I was made for more than survival.

Show me what more looks like. Show me the woman I'm becoming through this. Because I believe that what You're doing in me during these 21 days isn't just about restoring my marriage. It's about restoring me. And the woman who comes out on the other side of this, she's going to be stronger, softer, deeper and more alive than the woman who went in.

Thank You for this first week, Father. Thank You for every moment You met me in the quiet. Thank You for the strength You gave me to show up even when I didn't feel like it. Fill me now for the weeks ahead. I'm ready for what's coming. In the name of Jesus, Amen.

Your prayer for Day 7 is complete. You've finished your first week. That's not nothing. That's everything. Rest today if you can. Be gentle with yourself. Come back tomorrow for Day 8 where we enter Phase 2 of your protocol. Something powerful is about to begin. You're not alone in this.
